

Calculations of degree centrality, closeness centrality, and betweenness centrality for each seat choice (A-D):

	Node	Degree	Closeness	Betweenness
A	A	3	0.33333333	14.0
B	B	5	0.14285714	8.0
C	C	5	0.16666667	7.5
D	D	5	0.07142857	4.0

Network Graph with Centrality Measures

From above calculations, my preferable seat choice would be Seat C. My analysis will be presented in the below in details:

If I were to make the decision based on the centrality calculations, below shows how I would approach it:

With degree centrality of 5, closeness centrality of 0.17, and betweenness centrality of 7.5, seat C offers a compelling balance between being well-connected and somewhat central in the network. My direct connections are robust, suggesting frequent and varied interactions would be nearly guaranteed. This would be particularly advantageous for me if networking is a high priority during my internship. Daily exchanges could lead to a wealth of informal connections, enriching my understanding of the company culture and potentially unveiling opportunities within Fakebook.

On the flip side, while seat A's higher closeness and betweenness centrality might position someone as a key node for information flow, seat C's slightly lower centrality metrics still place me in a strategic spot without being the sole conduit for communication. This could relieve some pressure that comes with the expectation to facilitate interactions between others.

Choosing seat C might be less beneficial for me if I value quiet time to prepare for the day or if I prefer fewer but deeper conversations. The constant opportunity for interaction could be a distraction, potentially impeding my ability to concentrate on pre-work morning routines or personal reflection.

The benefits of seat C would shine on days when I'm feeling sociable and ready to engage. Conversely, on days when I'm gearing up for intensive work or need solitude, the choice might feel less fitting. The ideal scenario for consistently choosing seat C would be one where the benefits of building a broad professional network align closely with my internship goals and personal disposition towards frequent social interaction.